Misc.: 1844 (age 50-51) Underground Railroad Activity - hid John Rhodes and family in his haystack; Hamilton County, Indiana, United States<sup>39,40,41,42,43,44,45,46</sup>

John Rhodes Affair Web Page (Mine): <http://www.robbaasfamily.com/Misc/John%20Rhodes%20Affair.htm>

"While this slavery agitation was going on, another line of work sprung up known as the Under Ground Railroad. Some of the slaves had found out, by some means or other, that if they could get across the Ohio river into Indiana or Ohio that they would find friends that would hide them from the slave hunter, and help them through to Canada. Grandfather was very active in this work. One instance of this work we might mention: This was known as the "John Rhodes Case." [1]

Extract: A part of the John Rhoads Story: Page 261: "The first night after John Rhoads and family had 'spilled' out of the wagon, they were taken to a haystack, belonging to Robert Tomlinson, where they remained till morning." [2]

States this case happened in 1844, and not in 1837 as stated in the Hamilton County History [3]

On the ancestral farm near the church grounds which still is owned by the Tomlinson family, ceremonies have been held occasionally attracting wide attention recalling pre-Civil War days when, in the "peaceful" Quaker tradition, the great-great grandfather of Bishop Tomlinson maintained one of the most active stations on the "underground railway" for escaped Negro slaves fleeing to Canada. The next attempt of this kind was the building of the Dismal saw mill in the year 1847, the first steam mill that did any good in

Hamilton County. So well known was the work of this mill that a bridge contractor hired the men of the mill to furnish the timbers to build the first railroad bridge across the White river at Noblesville. This hauling was all done with oxen. [1]
